CHAPTER XX.

A STRANGE BISTORY.

When Vito saw her aim had been treacherou in its intent, she instantly fled the room. Julian was deeply touched at the sad fate of his sister. But his sense of right and justice, saw in it the hand of Providence. Gently laying her upon the floor, he called Mariano and Kit out upon the piazza. "Go and arouse your mis'ress," he said to Mariane. "Bid ber dress and come hither, but say nothing of what has happened. Hasten. Kit,

He led the way to the left along the piazza, until they came to the end, which they found to extend into the wall of the Cathedral di San Pedro, forming a niche large enough for a secret door. Julian felt about in the darkness for some time, but failing to find the spring, he bethought him of the lamp in the room of the late tragedy, and returning, secured it. By its dim light, he at last succeeded in finding the spring, and the door flew open at his touch, revealing a pair of stairs, which descended into impenetrable

In a few moments Mariano reappeared, supporting the excited and bewildered Leola. When she beheld her lover, she fell, overpowered, into

"Bear up, sweet Leola!" he said, kissing her "We will soon be out of harm's way for the last time. Nothing shall ever part us She would have said something but he motioned her to silence, and giving the lamp to Kit, he bade him lead the way down stairs, while he supported Leola.

They descended the steps slowly to considerable depth, until they found themselves upon a long narrow gallery, which they followed until they arrived at another pair of stairs, which they also descended, and entered a small sachristi room, the door of which led into the broad aisles of the great Cathedral. From this they easily gained egrees to the street.

"Whar now?" asked Kit, who had remained behind to extinguish the lamp, and close the "You and Mariano walk close behind us; we go to the palace of Señor Henrico Allevan, my artiste friend."

"Well, Henrico, what is the news?" asked They were all seated in a secret room in palace, where they had been concealed by the

"There is much stir in the city," said his friend, who had just returned from the scene of the tra-"The discovery that the Grey Monk was the Arch-bishop, has aroused the church, while the death of Castillias has awakened the patriots. The disappearance of Don Valerio like 1 to have caused me some trouble; but when I told them that I only knew him by a Cuban correspondent's introduction, I was at once relieved from all blame. A friend of mine will claim the body of your sister, at the proper time, and see it decently interred. So you have nothing to do, but reads patiently where you are, and have no fears of detection."

Julian thanked his friend, and then turning to Leola, who had been informed of the particulars of the tragedy, he said:

"And now, Leola, in answer to your oft-repeated request, I will narrate to you my sad and mournful history; but in doing so, must mingle with it, that of others. Listen: Some iffeen years ago, there was a middle aged man, with one or two children, engaged as bell ringer for the Cathedral de San Pedro. What his early history was, no one knew, but it soon became apparent to the priesthood, that he was a man of immense learning, and great shrewdness, His wife, at last died, leaving a child-a young girl of a few months old, and a son, then some ten or twelve, upon the care and attention of the father.

"Finding himself thus embarrassed, and at the same time, free from the shackles of married life, he resolved to put away his children, and enter sthood. This he did. The boy was sent to school, and the girl babe, was placed in the care of the Sisters of Charity. The bell ringer of San Pedro, soon startled the Ministry with his wisdom and erudition. Among the Franciscans and Carmelites none were so - mane and benificent as he; among the Jesuits, none so ming and heartless. Step by step he mounted the ladder-first the Diocess of the city, then a Bishopric, and finally—the Arch-bishop was found deed in his bed, one morning. The doctors said it was apoplexy; some few whispered—poison! At any rate, the bell ringer became Arch-bish-

"His son, a wild and reckless fellow, left schoo at sixteen, discipated, committed a felony, and fied to the mountains, where he found a band of robbers, and for years, was a pest to the country. This brings me to my own history. Five year ago, my father was one of the wealthiest men in the republic, and held the office of President of the Austanienta. But he was a Liberal, a party which has ever been an eye sore to the church Upon one occasion, the robber Castillias perpe rated some outrage near the city, and the council, at the instance of my father, sent a company of dragoons after him, which destroyed the greater

"For this," continued Julian. "At the instance of the Arch blahop, my father was assessinated in the street, and on the same day, my mother The eath of vengeance I then swore, has been fulfilled, and it remains in your power alone to 'be wounds of the past."

She had wept bitterly, as he narrated his story, and when he bad finished, she twined her arms around his neck, and hissed him fervently. "And that little catermount, Vito-who is she, Julian ?" asked Kit. "The girl babe that was born in the tower of San Pedro anghter of the Arch-bishop," said

Nine o'clock, on the morning of the 14th of September, 1847, was a glad day to our here and his friends. For at that hour, on that day, the American troops filled the Grand Plaza, as General Scott passed through to take up his quarters in the Fational Palace. The city was under military ru'e, and they were permitted to come forth from their concealment, and once more shake hands with their old friends, by whom Julian and Kit were received with rapturous greeting.

A few weeks after they all returned to Matamoras, where Julian succeeded in disposing of Leola's estates, and where the double marriage was duly solemnized. They then, by natural consent, turned their backs upon a country which had given them nothing but sorrow, and sought out a home in the flowery state of Texas, where peace spread her mantel for their footsteps, and happiness built a dwelling for their abode.

Vito was never heard of more in the city of Mexico. Yet her history must have been one of startling interest-hidden though it be from the world. Who shall pen the life-story of the last scion of the Grey Monk. THE END.
